Nightly News

Monday, 4/19

Kevin Tibbles reports on why the drivers of mid-size cars are vulnerable to being broadsided by SUV's.

Dateline

Friday, 4/30

How safe is the food your child is eating in school? NBC's Chris Hansen investigates the health of the nation's public school cafeterias. The report uses public records to look at critical violations -- the things health inspectors find that, unchecked, could lead to illness. The kinds of critical violations examined by Dateline include the presence of vermin (rats, roaches, etc.), whether food is kept cool enough to prevent spoilage, whether it's cooked hot enough to thwart bacteria, and if the food handling is clean. .By obtaining paper and computerized public records on health inspections, Dateline analyzed common problems and pinpointed the schools with the worst violations. Among the city schools examined for the story are: St.Louis, MO, Washington, DC, Nashville, TN, & Phoenix, AZ. (Additional cities might be featured in the report..)

Connecting With Kids                      4/14/04

In 1970 there were only two major sexually transmitted diseases in the US; today, the Centers for Disease Control tracks more than twenty-five STD's. In 1970, the rate of infection was one in 300; the infection rate for sexually active teenagers today is one in four. Three million cases a year among teenagers alone. It is a growing, silent epidemic that no one wants to talk about. "People don't want to talk about," says 18-year-old David Hartstein, "because there is a stigma attached to having an STD."

There is another silent epidemic, too. The silence between parents and their children when it comes to discussing sex and ways to prevent sexually transmitted disease. Experts say since teenagers are often reluctant to bring up the topic, it is up to parents to break the silence. Dr. Victoria Cornelius, an adolescent physician at St. Louis University, says parents must get involved "even though their children may be pushing them away."

The consequences of STD infection, including chlamydia, herpes and HIV, are too devastating to ignore.

Dateline

Friday, 4/9

In April 2001, Cincinnati police shot and killed Timothy Thomas, an unarmed African-American teenager, sparking days of civil unrest. Thomas had been wanted on 14 outstanding police warrants stemming from traffic tickets for non-moving violations. Some black Cincinnati residents accused the police department of racial profiling and harassment.

Following the Thomas case, Dateline launched an unprecedented 14-month investigation examining whether racial profiling exists in Cincinnati and other cities across the country, specifically in the issuance of tickets for non-moving violations.

Dateline embarked on this investigation in an attempt to answer the question: In an effort to fight crime, do police issue a disproportionate number of tickets to African American drivers or are those allegations unfounded?

The broadcast first examined more than 100,000 tickets issued by Cincinnati police. In addition, by using open record laws in various states, Dateline compiled and analyzed every traffic stop and tickets in a dozen more major cities. We have already contacted those cities featured in the Dateline investigation where police pulled over and ticketed blacks for non-moving violations at a rate higher than whites.

They include the following:

Boston, Worcester, & Springfield, MA
Cincinnati & Dayton, OH
Houston, TX
Denver, CO

St Louis & Kansas City, MO
Richmond, VA
Minneapolis, MN
San Diego, CA
